A marriage was celebrated at the Court-House yesterday under rather peculiar cir-cumstances. Some days since a darky named Alex. Sharon was tried before the named Alex. Sharon was tried before the Criminal Court on a very serious charge—that of assault with intent to murder. After a tedious trial and in the face of a mass of very damaging testimony he managed to secure an acquittal. Yesterday morning, upon information fornished him, Judge Douglass issued a bench warrant for Sharon and for a negro woman named Lizzie Logan, charging them with illegal cohabitation. Immediately after the warrant was issued Alex in company with an escret of the authorship will give rise to much lively guessing.

MR. J. H. INGRAM has published through Redway of London and Armstrong of New York a pretty little edition of Poe's "Raven," accompanied by an account of the genesis of the poem; a short history of it; translations of it into French, German, Hungarian and Latin; together with most of the fabrications and parodies to which its success gave rise. The volume also contains bibliography and index and a version of Albert Pike's "Isadore," a poem from which Mr. Ingram believes Poe "derived the germ thought" of the "Raven."
